Pro-choice campaigners take abortion pills in defiance of the law in Northern Ireland

Pro-choice campaigners have taken abortion pills outside Northern Ireland's main court buildings in defiance of the strict laws governing terminations.

There were tense scenes and heavy security as activists on both sides of the controversial debate met earlier today.

Northern Ireland is the only part of the UK where the procedure is not legal, aside from exceptional cases, after Ireland voted last week to allow it in early pregnancy.

Pro-choice activists are campaigning to make the law the same across the whole of the UK and London's high court will issue a ruling on it next week.
